

A Campaign for Nature:

How Stewart Udall's Legacy Can
Help Us Solve the Conservation Crisis

Friday, Feb 7th, 8:30AM, National Press Club

PRESENTED BY:

IN PARTNERSHIP WITH:

OUR DAILY PLANET

Honored Speakers:

- New Mexico Senator Tom Udall
- Hon. Bruce Babbitt, Former Secretary of the Interior and Former Arizona Governor
- Hon. Sally Jewell, Former Secretary of the Interior and Interim CEO of The Nature Conservancy
- Kendall Edmo, Blackfeet Nation Office of Historic Preservation
- Dr. Enric Sala, Explorer-in-Residence, National Geographic Society

RSVP Here

Live Streaming Will Be Available

Former Congressman and Secretary of the Interior Stewart Udall, one of America's greatest conservation champs, would be turning 100 on January 31st. At the beginning of this new decade – one in which we must collectively address the crises facing climate and nature – Stewart Udall's legacy can inform a bold vision for the future, with the U.S. embracing aggressive and inclusive conservation action. The Campaign for Nature, an effort to accelerate the pace of nature conservation and help protect 30 by 30 – at least 30% of the planet by 2030 – is exactly that kind of action.

As Secretary of the Interior, Stewart Udall helped enact many of America's most meaningful conservation laws, including the Wilderness Act, the Endangered Species Act, and the Land and Water Conservation Fund. His leadership and determination also led to the creation of more than one hundred beloved parks and protected places, including Canyonlands National Park in Utah, North Cascades National Park in Washington, Redwood National Park in California, the Great Swamp National Wildlife Refuge in New Jersey, and the Appalachian National Scenic Trail from Georgia to Maine.

“Plans to protect air and water, wilderness and wildlife, are in fact plans to protect man.

- Stewart Udall